

Corals and other cnidarians are some of the oldest extant metazoans. As such, they have been dealing with viral and microbial pathogens since the pre-Cambrian. During our studies of coral reef microbiology, we have characterized a completely novel immune system used by cnidarians and probably by most other macro-organisms. I will discuss this new immune system in context of coral reef health and decline.