

Evolution in prokaryotes is a process of gene gain as well as gene loss. Gene loss is often attributed to genetic drift or to the purging of deleterious genes for the given environment. In this seminar, two cases will be discussed where selection has favored the loss of beneficial gene functions in bacteria. One case involves carbon starvation in a heterotroph, and the second oxidative stress in a photoautotroph.